Civilian hiring resumes after freeze lifted

By Richard Salomon

Air Force Personnel Center Public Affairs

JOINT BASE SAN ANTONIO-RANDOLPH – The Air Force Personnel Center is partnering with customers with the goal of resuming normal “first-in, first-out” operations since the government-wide hiring freeze ended in early April.

Based on Air Force priorities, AFPC personnel are first working all pending firm job offers where tentative offers have already been made and actions where selections have been made but no tentative job offer has been issued. They are currently working more than 12,000 requests for personnel action.

“We are continuing to work with leadership from the major and combatant commands regarding critical hires and actions already in the works here at AFPC,” said Christine Armstrong, the AFPC’s civilian sustainment and transitions programs division chief.

In addition to the lifting of the hiring freeze, an Office of Management and Budget memorandum directs each government agency to develop a reform plan as part of a broader effort to reform the government and reduce the size of the federal civilian workforce. As a result, Air Force leaders have been directed to scrutinize recruitment actions that are being sent to AFPC to make sure the positions accurately reflect mission needs.

Little Rock AFB IMSO earns AF level award

By Airman 1st Class Kevin Sommer Giron
19th Airlift Wing Public Affairs

The 714th Training Squadron International Military Student Office was recognized as the 2016 U.S. Air Force IMSO Team of the Year in the small activities category for their service to more than 100 international students.

"This is the first time the office has won an award like this," said Master Sgt. Larry Holland, 714th Training Squadron IMSO NCOIC. "It goes to show that we might be a small office but we have a gigantic footprint."

As leaders of the largest international training program, the 714th TRS IMSO plays a vital role in the 314th Airlift Wing's Center of Excellence, a C-130 training school, where students learn career-specific fundamentals of Combat Airlift.

While international students learn technical skills at the school house, the IMSO is tasked with easing the transition from their respective countries to the United States.

Holland, along with Maj. Jonathon Ferricher and Master Sgt. Stephanie Erskine, facilitated everything from the student's transportation and documents to their morale and understanding of the American culture.

"We are the first and last people they see at the airport," Holland said. "We have a really big impact on how they feel about Americans as a whole and that is ultimately our big picture: to make them feel comfortable with being in America, so they can enjoy their experience."

Winners of the IMSO Team of the Year award show exceptional job performance and support to international students by effectively managing any issues the students and their dependents face.

They also take initiative in implementing the field studies program. A program designed to immerse students into American culture through events and outings on base and in the local area.

The office of three may be small, but their support reaches hundreds of students from all around the globe annually, helping strengthen partnerships with more than 47 allied nations.

"The IMSO award let us know that we were successful in trying to make the students feel at home," Erskine said. "Partnerships are what makes us a cohesive unit at home and in contingency operations."

Therapists stretch limitations of Airmen

By Airman 1st Class Codie Collins
19th Airlift Wing Public Affairs

Flexibility is the key to Combat Airlift in more ways than one. By pushing and pulling Airmen both physically and mentally, Little Rock Air Force Base physical therapy technicians stretch Airmen to a better state of health.

Senior Airman Hessen Martinez Cruz, 19th Medical Operations Squadron physical therapy technician, works to ensure every patient who comes into the physical therapy clinic is rehabilitated to the best of his ability.

When Airmen suffer from illness or injury, their motor functions can often be adversely compromised. Physical therapy technicians work closely with patients to help them heal and promote overall wellness by helping restore function, improve mobility and relieve pain.

Martinez Cruz's approximate 50 patients a day are ensured the best care the Air Force can provide.

"I have had patients with their knees completely broken and swollen to the point where it looks like you shouldn't even touch it," Martinez Cruz said. "They start out on crutches, not being able to put weight on a knee and we get them to the point where they are able to walk."

From identifying problems to developing and implementing a care plan, physical therapy specialists like Martinez Cruz work with patients as long as necessary so they can resume healthy, active lifestyles.

clinic doesn't limit you to a certain amount of visits," Martinez-Cruz said. "We make sure we've helped you as much as we can before we let you go. Once you are well enough to fulfill the mission and a fitness assessment, we incorporate you back into normal duties."

Rehabilitation isn't only a way to re-accomplish the mission, it's a way that gets Airmen back to their lifestyles.

"The clinic is focused on getting Airmen not only back to the mission and the physical assessment, but also for them to be able to enjoy things like family, play with the kids and live a normal life," Martinez Cruz said.

The dedication Martinez Cruz has towards his patients does not go unnoticed.

"Senior Airman Martinez Cruz is a true professional," said Staff Sgt. Ralph Hallmon, 19th Medical Operations Squadron physical therapy technician. "He approaches each interpersonal encounter with immense enthusiasm. With his presence, the physical therapy technician career field has truly improved. He exemplifies the notion of dedicated Airman and embodies our core values of Integrity First, Service Before Self and Excellence in All We Do."

Martinez Cruz, a Cuban-native, joined the U.S. Air Force with the intention of commissioning.

"I am very grateful to the Air Force for all of the opportunities that I have had and also for the opportunities I have ahead of me and reach for," Martinez Cruz said.

Until then, Martinez Cruz will be working diligently as a physical therapy technician here.

The base physical therapy clinic is open Monday through Friday 7:30am to 2:30 pm.

Airmen ensure safe working conditions

When illness prevention comes to mind, some people may imagine doctors working in a lab searching for cures to formidable diseases. However, the 19th Aerospace Medicine Squadron Bioenvironmental Engineers are unsung scientists, chemists and microbiologists who specialize in identifying potential health hazards in the workplace and surrounding areas.

“Daily operations can vary from conducting radiation surveys, testing water and air samples, to responding to hazardous emergency,” said Senior Airman Ivan Monroy, 19th AMDS bioenvironmental engineer. “In an emergency response, we drop everything we’re doing and load up our vehicles to respond to the scene and complete the mission.”

Prevention is their focus and the partnerships they have with on and off base agencies are vital to the health of Team Little Rock. From the 19th Civil Engineer Squadron Explosive Ordnance Disposal and Fire Department to local authorities and the FBI, the Airmen work to eliminate carcinogens and other harmful illnesses through identification, isolation and testing.

A huge part of their job is acquiring the knowledge needed, and forming an impenetrable bond to protect one another from harm since they often face dangerous situations.

“We are a family,” said Master Sgt. Peter Stein, 19th AMDS bioenvironmental flight chief. “When we are fully suited for a hazardous response, there’s only 45 minutes of air in the tanks; we need to watch out for one another incase an Airman runs out of air.”

Every tool in the bioenvironmental arsenal is strategically employed for the detection of various pollutants and radiation in the environment. Tools are used to survey ventilation systems for uncontaminated airflow, check water potential hydrogen levels for pollutants and equip deploying service members with lifesaving gas masks.

Their expertise ensures healthy working conditions so the environment is not adversely affected by harmful resources.

“One thing I stress to my Airmen is how important they are,” Stein said. “They may not be the doctor who is treating the cancer, but they are the technicians who are preventing the cancer from happening in the first place.”

AF proposes personnel increase to command support staffs

By Staff Sgt. Alyssa C. Gibson
Secretary of the Air Force Public Affairs

WASHINGTON – The Air Force plans to increase commander support staff manning across the force by 1,600 by fiscal year 2022 increasing total authorizations to more than 6,300.

Currently, the personnel increase calls for 170 officers, 469 enlisted and 961 civilians with all civilian hires authorized for fiscal 2018.

The increase in CSS manning ties directly to the Air Force chief of staff's first focus area – revitalizing squadrons. Air Force Chief of Staff Gen. David L. Goldfein announced this focus area within the first month of his tenure, and appointed Brig. Gen. Stephen L. Davis, the director of Air Force manpower, organization and resources, as lead of this initiative.

"Squadrons are the core unit of the Air Force," Davis said. "We must ensure they have the support required to accomplish the mission and support their Airmen. This is one step of many we plan to take to help revitalize Air Force squadrons."

One of the first milestones of revitalizing squadrons was the reduction of additional duties for Airmen across the Air Force. A comprehensive review of duties under the direct control of the Air Force resulted in the elimination, reassignment, or reduction of 29 of 61 additional duties identified under Air Force Instruction 38-206, "Additional Duty Management."

While this lessened the workload for the majority of Airmen within the service, many of the duties were realigned under CSS. In August 2016 the Air Force committed to ensuring CSS requirements are funded and positions filled as quickly as possible within budget limits.

The new positions will be prioritized by need across the Air Force. Some of the more than 1,975 active-duty squadrons are already fully manned while others are minimally manned. The Air Force will work with major commands to assess areas of greatest need and prioritize manning.

Davis said the manning increase is key to re-establishing the CSS to full capability.

"The CSS provides critical support to the squadron, but not all of these positions were fully funded in the past," Davis said. "We're fixing that and will also add new positions to increase the level of CSS support for many squadrons. Fully funding the increased CSS requirement is a key element in revitalizing Air Force squadrons."
